Where Japan's Farming, Culture, and Fashion Began

Many aspects of Japanese culture are thought to have originated from the Kyotango area. Legends attribute the start of rice farming in Japan to Xu Fu, a Chinese explorer, with some claims that he settled near Kyotango around 200BCE. Along with the harvest of rice, the production of sake, rice wine, also started in the Kyotango area.

Ancient burial mounds in Kyotango contain evidence of extensive trade with the ancient kingdoms of China. Through this trade the Kyotango area is thought to have been one of the most influential regions on the Sea of Japan.

Some of Japan's most enduring legends can also trace their origins to Kyotango. The legends of 'Urashima Taro', a fisherman who went on a magical adventure only to find hundreds of years had passed in his village, and 'Otohime' an angel who came to Earth and married a hunter, can both trace their oldest written versions to the 'Tango no Kuni Fudoki', a chronicle of legends from in and around Kyotango.

Kyotango has been at the heart of the kimono industry for over 300 years. The chirimen silk fabric produced here is of a very high quality, and has helped to shape styles and trends of this cultural icon.

In this way the Kyotango area has shaped Japanese culture for thousands of years.
